Horsetail Medicine

In the Pacific Northwest, Horsetail grows in creeks and stream sides, and in damp, shaded areas. It is growing alongside Western Skunk Cabbage. On Vancouver Island, the new shoots are ready to harvest in March when they are about 10-15 cm tall. The plant has a thick, fleshy stalk. The harvest is done by cutting the stalks with a sharp knife.

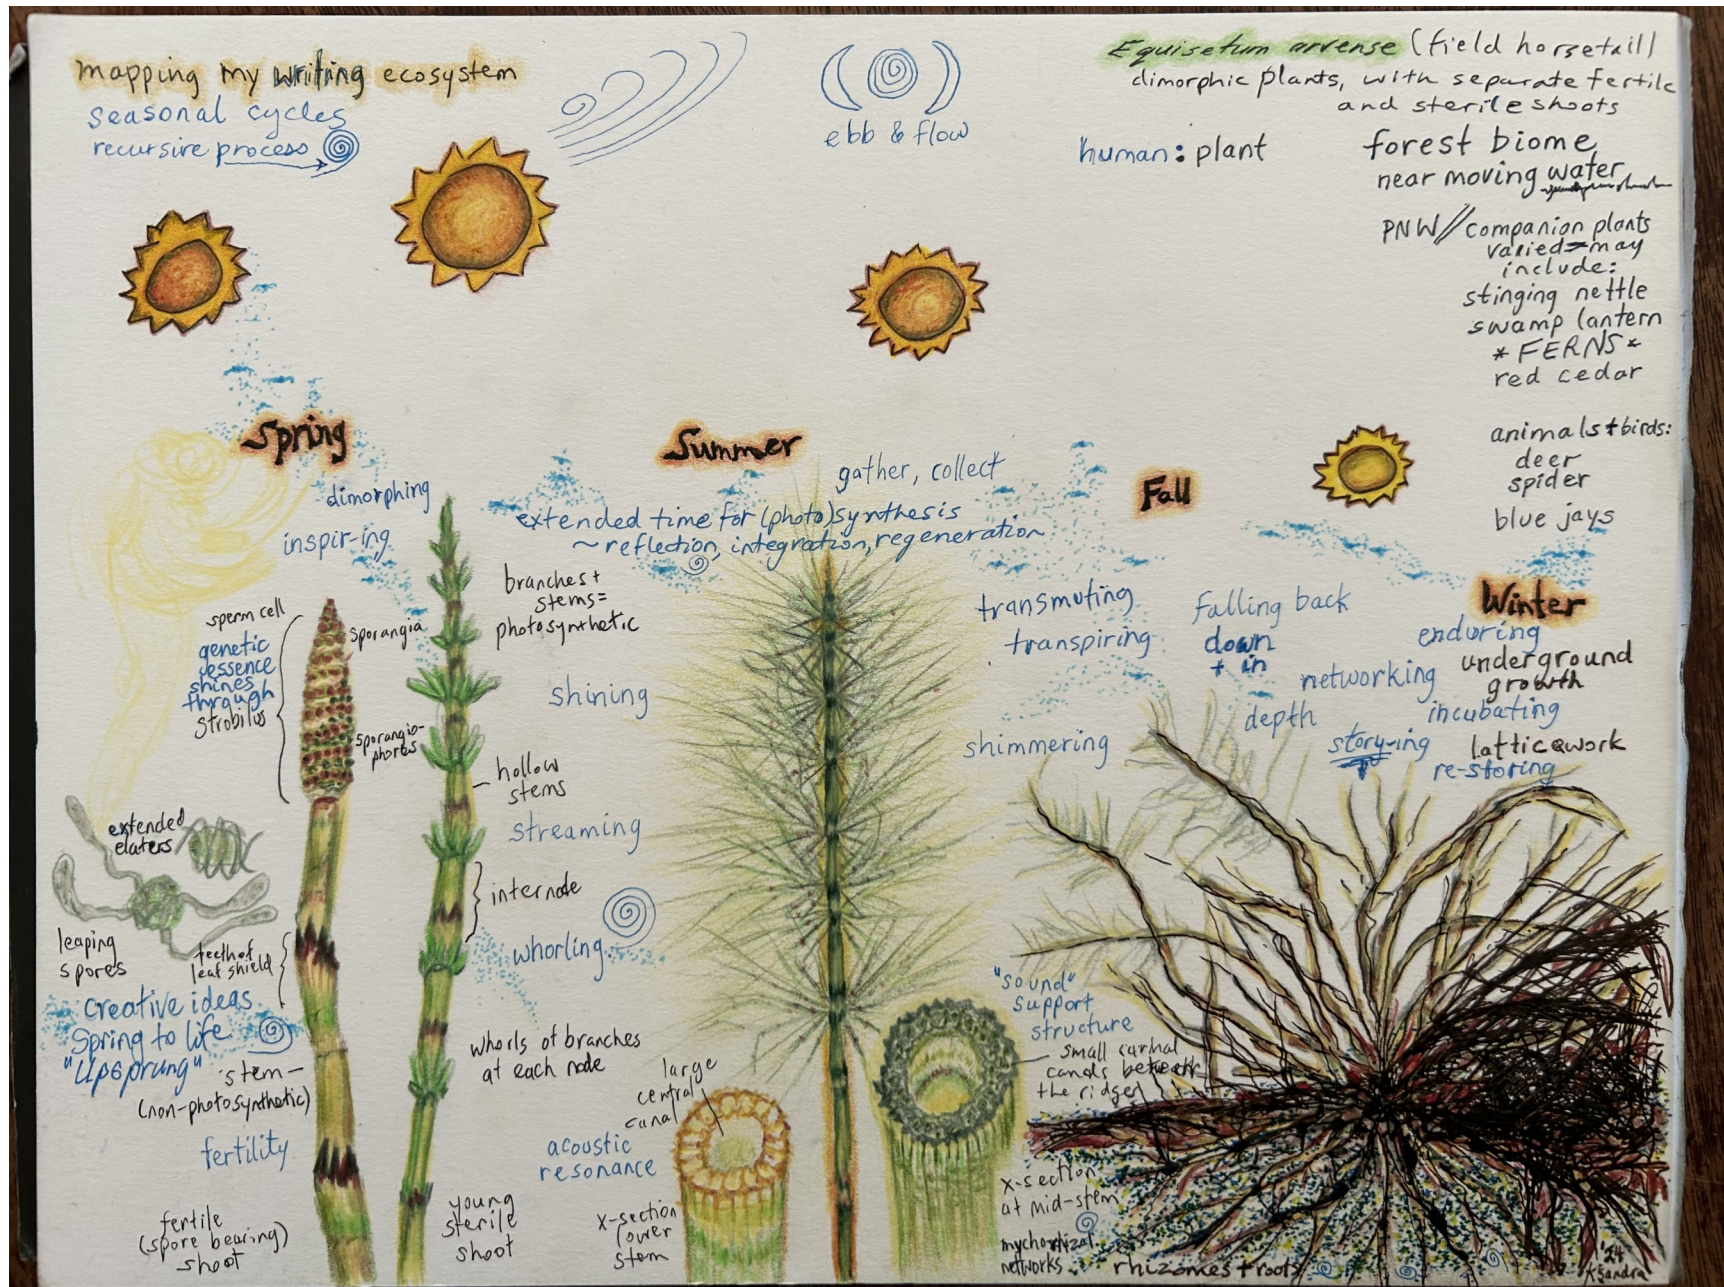

Horsetail is best harvested in early spring when the plants have just started to grow. The stalks can be harvested at any angle off the stalk, after they have become woody. It is best to not harvest the leaves as they are less available. It is best to not harvest the leaves as they can contain mineral crystals.

New spring shoots are at the perfect time for use in infused vinegar, infused honey, and other preparations. Large amounts of the healing silica in the plant can be used to treat various ailments, which are helpful for allergies, asthma, and other respiratory issues.

The fresh plant is generally considered to be more effective than the dried plant. The dried plant loses its color, but it can still be used for that purpose for medicinal purposes. The plant contains inflammatory compounds that dissipate over time.
